Excerpt: .been taught by experience how to solve the problem. Shall not we learn from it also? The simple cure of all the evil is to lock the tie and rail together, and hence this fastening, which I now submit to you, has been named the Tie Lock, as a fit and distinguishing title. It is covered by no patent, and is submitted to the profession for suggestions in its minor details that may make it more perfect. The proposer is in no way interested in its manufacture or adoption beyond a desire to see it proved, believing that it will be found most beneficial to our railroads. Since our Centennial celebration and the reciprocal communication produced by it between the two countries, America has willingly learned some good lessons from Old England. Is it not unaccountable that her experience in railroad track, in this particular, should have...
