The gerund is often used instead of the infinitive with to, probably by confusion with it in earlier times. You cannot decline seeing him = you cannot decline to see him. He began counting the money = he began to count. 237. In transitive verbs which require an object to make complete sense, the present participle is always active, the past participle always passive; but the past participle acquires an active meaning in combination with having, corresponding in this way with the past participle of deponent verbs in Latin. Thus--Beaten is passive; having beaten is active. There is no presumption worth mentioning against his having exerted this miraculous power. --Butler s Analogy. Is it well to wish thee happy 1--having known me, to decline On a range of lower feelings, and a narrower heart than mine! -- Tennyson. This happy night the Frenchmen are secure, Saving all day caroused and banqueted Shakespear, 1 Henry VI. The past participle is often compounded with being, and thus acquires a present force-- Why, so! being gone, I am a man again. --/Shakespeare, Macbeth. In composition with having been, the past participle is used of an action regarded as present at a moment of past time--Having been left behind, having been forgotten, having been seen, c. 238. The past participle is often used elliptically. He, after Eve seduced, unminded slunk Into the wood fast by. --Milton. Six frozen winters spent, Return with welcome...
