A stratum of shells and sand consolidated by the same means as the preceding and about eighteen inches thick. IV. A superficial layer of loose shells eighteen inches in the thickest part and extending inland about twenty feet, but becoming thinner as it recedes from the shore. Large blocks of the conglomerate are broken off from time to time by the undermining action of the river, and the whole bluff will, at no very distant period, be destroyed. The remains of animals are found very sparingly, and consist of the bones of turtles and fishes. We have found charcoal but neither pottery nor implements in the more solid portion, and some doubt may reasonably be entertained whether this is of artificial origin. A somewhat less complete consolidation exists at Blue Spring, where there can be no doubt about the artificial origin of the deposits. The conglomerate is equally solid, and the shells have mostly lost their forms, having been more or less broken into small fragments. Adjoining the bluff is a large shell field, which the proprietor informs me covers about twenty acres. The shells are generally deposited in a thin layer, and in some places have a thickness of about eighteen inches. It extends from the bluff just described, southward along the shores of a lagoon which was probably once the channel of the river. Pottery, the bones of animals, and implements, especially of shells, are found here in great abundance. A...
