Not illustrated. 1718 Excerpt: .God could, if he had pleased, have freely forgiven our Sins without any Satisfaction. For Men, who have less Power than God, may lawfully part with their own right, and freely remit Wrongs committed against them. And he that doth so is more generous and merciful: Therefore it is probable that God exacted no Satisfaction from Christ in our stead. Anfw. The Dealings of God towards Men are not to be measured by the Rules whereby Men are to walk. For private Men are bound to forgive Injuries in the Christian Sense; and the supream Magistrate may in some Cases dispense with his own Laws. But God could not with safety to his Honour and Authority pardon Sinners without some Satissaction; not because he hath less Power than Men, but because he is more excellent, and infinite in all Perfections: For his Truth and Justice are as essential to him as his Power. And since his Law threatened to punish Sin with Death, it would not stand with the Honour of his Truth and Justice to have acquitted us from Punishment without some valuable Satissaction. And by translating the Punishment, which we had deserved on Christ his Son, God preserved his Truth inviolable, and fully declared his Justice against Sin, and magnified. his Honour, Wisdom, and Holiness much more, than if his Law had been executed. But if God had absolutely dispensed with his injur d Law, without any Satissaction, he must have cast a blemish...
